

From Childhood Passion To Fulfilled Career

The changing nature of work and skills are making life-long learning more important than ever. A new survey from Pearson, a digital education company, shows working adults in America understand and agree that learning new skills or specialties would positively affect their life, well-being and employability. Pearson’s new “Dare to learn, Dare to change” campaign shows a pathway for adults to rediscover childhood passions through life-long learning.

66%
Of working adults surveyed say they would like to return to education

35%
Of those who didn’t follow their childhood career aspirations say it was because of “life getting in the way”

35%
Of working adults say they are motivated to return to school to get a better job

37%
Of people want to pursue a new interest for work

34%
Of working adults want to learn new skills for their current career

70%
agree they would be better students as adults than as children

